 There's many a one who'll watch for me,
 But their watch will be in vain;
 And the smile that welcomed my coming once,
 I may never meet again.
 The hopes that thrilled my beating heart
 In by-gone days, are o'er;
 And I only long to clasp the form
 Of my early loved once more.

4
 There's darkness gathering o'er me now,
 And faintness o'er my heart;
 Yet my mother's blessing sheds its light
 Around as I depart.
 His tones in stillness died away,
 And we only heard the sound
 Of the summer night-wind's gentle breath,
 As it softly murmured round.

5
 We laid him down in silence there,
 By the quiet stream to rest,
 Where the weeping willow mournfully
 Drooped downward to its breast;
 And stands alone, to mark the place
 Where rests the true and brave;
 Where a soldier breathed his last on earth,
 And found a strangers grave.
